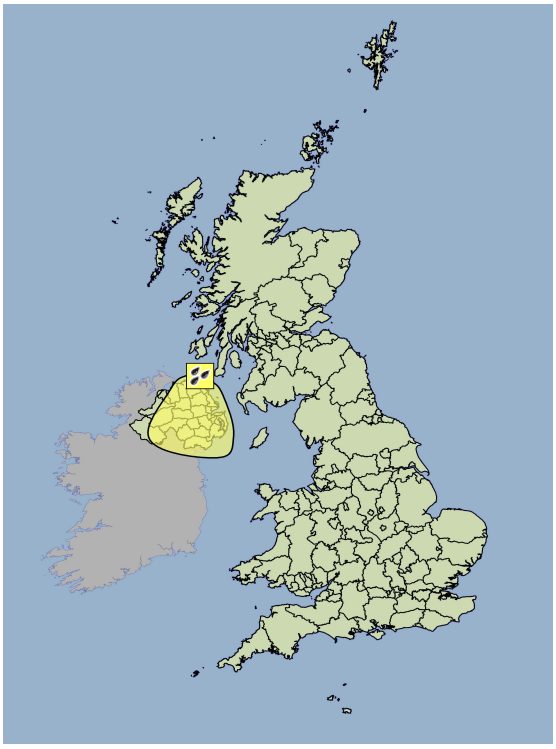
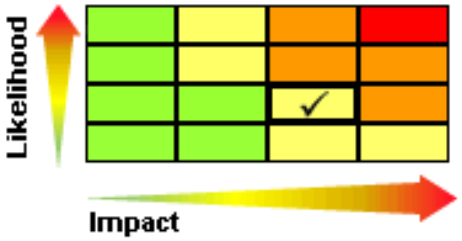
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
An area of low pressure will develop just to the northwest of Ireland on Sunday evening as warm air from the south and cold air from the north come together. This will push a band of heavy rain across Northern Ireland on Sunday night and Monday morning with the largest accumulations over the eastern counties. 20-40 mm may fall in a short period of time with around 50-60 mm possible in the east, especially over the Mourne Mountains and Antrim Hills. This will lead to standing water and surface water flooding in places. This may be exacerbated by windblown debris reducing drainage. The rain will be accompanied by gale force southeasterly winds, these becoming severe in the east. Please refer to the separate wind warning for full details.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 21:00 on Sun, 05th Oct 2014 until 08:00 on Mon, 06th Oct 2014

An area of heavy rain accompanied by gale force southeasterly winds will move eastwards across Northern Ireland late Sunday evening and overnight. The rain will clear the east coast on Monday morning.
The public should be aware of the risk of surface water flooding and some disruption to travel, especially where drainage is reduced by fallen leaves.

This warning has been updated to bring forward the start time to 2100 Sunday and to suggest a low risk of medium impacts.
